Dear Peter Lambert

I have driven your cars all my life. At present it's the Chrysler 300C. It is a pleasure to drive, looks great, and just right for me as a self-made man. I may trade up to a Mercedes, which I see you also make. I won't be put off by Clarkson saying that braking in a Mercedes is so brutal that it would be less painful to actually hit the tree you were trying to miss, or that the noise of a Mercedes is like the sound of Barry White eating wasps. Actually the last comment is a compliment, because Mrs Shullot is a big fan of the late Mr White, or the Walrus of Love that she keeps telling me he was called.

What worries me is this rubbish about climate change. It's a complete fiction based on dodgy computer simulations and scientists shouting loudly to get funding for their pet projects. Why don't they admit that the sun is responsible for climate change and that earth has often been hotter than it is now? Can they tell me if it will be raining on June 10th next year when I and the lady wife will go to France to visit the fine wine and beer warehouses of Calais? No. Exactly. So why I should believe them about climate change?

I think you understand what I'm saying. Didn't Chrysler used to be part of the Global Climate Coalition set up to expose this hoax? Last year What Car asked car makers what they are doing about carbon emissions. You didn't respond. Good for you – you've got better things to do.

It's a conspiracy by the greens. They'd have us go back to the horse and cart, and toilets dug from holes in the ground.

Well done for not following the trend of other car makers who are chasing the green pound – there's no money in that. What I would like to know is how can you as a successful business in a competitive market carry on selling great cars to people like me, while pushing the greens into the holes that they would like us to dig?

Good luck to you and your fine company.

Yours sincerely

Peter Shullot
