Dear Dr Paul Golby

I've just discovered that Powergen is part of E.ON, the world's largest investor owned energy company and with around 9 million electricity and gas accounts. Being a doctor must be useful in your line of work. Good for you – and I'm proud to have one of those accounts. Or the wife is for expenses' purposes.

I've read that E.ON 'produce electricity from a portfolio of world class power stations'. I've heard of a share portfolio, not a portfolio of power stations. It sounds good. Perhaps the generic term for power stations could be a burn or a rage.

I'm concerned that your portfolio will need to close due to this commotion about climate change. Now, climate change is all to do with solar and earth activity and nothing about manmade pursuits. It's really about interference in big business. The government has said that meeting its targets to reduce CO2 emissions will mean a cut in GDP of 0.3-1.5% by 2050. 'Distribution of impact is likely to be uneven, with a small number of energy intensive industries impacted substantially more than other areas of the economy such as commercial and residential sectors.' That means you. So do you have plans to counter this nonsense?

Now I'm all for recycle, reuse, regurgitate, but turning down the central heating, turning off the television, and chucking out the baby with the bathwater – I'm not for it. And as for sharing baths. I last shared a bath with Mrs Shullot in the first flush of our relationship, thirty years ago. I'm not sure if either of us is ready to repeat the experience.

For the sake of your company and Mrs Shullot stick to your slogan – Help change today tomorrow. Let me know what your plans are. Good luck to you and your fine company.

Yours sincerely

Peter Shullot
